There are between 50 to 75 chief privacy officers... working inside U.S. companies today," said Alan Westin, publisher of the Hackensack, N.J.-based journal Privacy and American Business. CPOs have to work across the entire organization, because their positions integrate legal, marketing and technical concerns—and they'll have to work with regulators and consumer groups as well. It's a key hire: companies who invade privacy are susceptible to swift and damaging consumer backlash, so CPOs will become visible and public figures in their own right.
